Background

There are 12 vocational programmes in the Swedish upper secondary school system - each provides a foundation for working life and includes mandatory work-based learning periods - and six higher education preparatory programmes aimed to prepare learners for academic tertiary education. With a few exceptions, work-based learning and vocational subjects and courses are not available to learners in the higher education preparatory programmes.

Objectives

Introducing a vocational profile in higher education preparatory education.

Description

In September 2018, the government asked the National Agency for Education to develop a vocational orientation for the Business management and economics programme which is a higher education preparatory programme. The National Agency for Education will propose a vocational outcome that will serve as a hybrid between higher education preparatory programmes and vocational upper secondary programmes. The new orientation will serve as a pilot for introducing a vocational profile in higher education preparatory education. It would include mandatory work-based learning and mechanisms for cooperation between stakeholders in the trade and commerce sector and education providers. It is expected that learners will be prepared for employment in a sector that is undergoing rapid development and also for education at higher vocational institutions.
